The Way of the Needle

Traditional Japanese embroidery has held an important place in Japan's religious and secular culture for more than a thousand years. Those of us who study the traditional art and discipline of Japanese embroidery as taught by the Japanese Embroidery Center: Kurenai-Kai, follow the teaching of the renowned late Master Iwao Saito. His vision, to make Japanese embroidery available to people around the world, is now continued by his successors, and passed down through Authorised Graduate Tutors who wish to share their passion with others.

This traditional embroidery is worked with silk and metallic threads, usually on a silk ground using a frame of a type used in Japan for over a thousand years. With the fabric held drum-tight, tension can be kept on the threads to increase their shine. The extremely sharp hand made needles, and another essential tool called a tekobari, or stroking needle, are used to control the threads and to stroke flat silk to enhance the shine.

The type of silk used is reeled filament (not floss) silk, which is continuous and unbroken. Filaments wound off a cocoon can be over a mile long and sixteen of these filaments are combined to make up one strand of flat silk. This is used either flat or twisted by hand to a variety of thicknesses and degrees of twist.

Japanese goldwork is always a favourite with show visitors. Beautiful and in a class of its own, gold is usually couched down with Japanese orange red silk thread which warms and enriches the gold. Gold and silver work is often given an added dimension with layers of stitched padding of cotton and/or red silk beneath.

For anyone passionate about their craft, a feast of colour is an inspiration and we have over 250 colours of flat silk to choose from. Also, as well as the usual gold and silver, there are nearly 100 different colours and types of metallic threads to add highlights or emphasis to the embroidery. Even more options can be created by combining silks and metallics into one stitchable or couchable thread!

Good natural light is essential to us, not only in our stitching but also in the choosing of colours etc. Without good true daylight, a dull or rainy day will affect the choices that are made - and the time of day too, as you will choose more tired colours in the afternoon than those that you would choose in the morning!

Our frames are used in a horizontal position resting on a floor stand, and we stitch with our right hand above and left hand below, so that the needle and thread is passed smoothly through the silk fabric.

We sometimes use a unique Japanese box lamp which is lightweight enough to rest on our frames and gives directional illumination. When a wider area of light is needed a floor standing lamp is required as we cannot stand or attach anything heavy onto our frames. Good light also relieves eye strain and reduces the need for constant magnification.

Margaret Lewis,
Graduate & Authorised Tutor,
